

Build prevention capacity before the crisis.

A development-stage Art of Survival initiative connecting public education, safe routing, source governance, local planning tools, and accountable stakeholder coordination.

Immediate danger or violence in progress: call 911. Suicidal or emotional crisis support in the United States: call or text 988.

What GVRP is building

- A national public-learning hub focused first on mass- and school-violence prevention.
- Guidance for noticing concrete behavior and context, preserving useful information safely, and routing concerns to qualified humans.
- A source-linked library separating community violence, suicide and crisis, domestic violence, unauthorized firearm access, and targeted violence.
- An open local-planning scaffold communities can adapt with qualified owners, safeguards, service capacity, and evaluation.
- A Paterson listening and learning track - not a claimed field operation or active service network.

What GVRP is not

- Not an emergency service, crisis line, law-enforcement agency, investigative service, clinical provider, or threat-reporting portal.
- Not a predictive-policing, facial-recognition, watchlist, profiling, dangerousness-scoring, or automated-accusation product.
- Not affiliated with cited institutions unless a relationship is documented and publicly authorized.

Useful ways to contribute

Practitioners	Review routing, terminology, civil-rights safeguards, local feasibility, and unintended harms.
Researchers	Challenge evidence interpretation, measures, implementation assumptions, and correction rules.
Community leaders	Map existing capacity, trusted relationships, service gaps, and accountable owners.
Educators and creators	Make prevention knowledge understandable without sensationalizing violence or amplifying perpetrators.
